The Little Lives of Saints: St. Cuthbert

Told by Percy Dearme

Illustrated by Charles Robinson.

London: Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., 1904

AWAY up North beyond the Border, in the wild country of Lammermoor, lived a little orphan boy named Cuthbert. An old widow took care of him till he was big enough to go out and earn his living as a shepherd. He was the bravest and strongest boy in all that countryside: none could run so fast as he, or stand against him in wrestling and fighting. But when he became a shepherd, and sat through the long lonely nights on the bleak hills, looking at the stars and listening for the distant howling of the wolves, then deeper thoughts would come into his head. He thought of all the wonder of this great world, and of God who had made it, and of his own little self whom God had made to become like Him.

One night he saw a shower of bright shooting stars fall through the sky; they seemed to him like a company of angels who had come to fetch some pure soul to heaven. Next day he heard that just at that time St Aidan had died. So he determined to be a monk.

TO

All little children here and there,
Beside the fire and everywhere,
With happy eyes of brown or blue,
This little book is meant for you!

A WHILE AGO

The first time that I went to church
I was baptized, you know,
A tiny baby--brought to God
To learn how I should grow.
They made me God's own child
that day,
And marked me with His cross,
To carry it through all my life
(It does not show, of course).

I don't remember that day now,
But mother does, you see;
